

Pay per click - Common Internet advertising models for all

The most common of the Internet advertising models, pay per click programs is widely used on search engines, basic content sites and blogs. The basic working mechanism is that advertisers pay for the ads only when these get clicked on; content sites have a fix fee whereas the in the pay per click bidding system, the prices per keyword vary between different search engines. There is a close connection between ads display on certain sites and the content of the web pages. Thus, only web site that belong to the same domain of activity will be able to display and support your advertising efforts.

The largest and most important pay per click providers include Google Adwords, Yahoo!Search Marketing and Microsoft adCenter. From the list of pay per click search engines, Google has the highest fees by far. The advantage brought by this giant network comes as the outcome of extensive market exposure, which also gives a justification for the high costs. The very huge extent at which the pay per click system is used, has made it the right environment for the proliferation of frauds and fraudulent schemes.

How is profit made in the pay per click system? Well, as already mentioned, the advertisers are charged only when an ad gets clicked on. The same clicking system brings money to the websites that display the ads. In both cases, the pay per click engine has a share of profit. Sponsored links are by far the most rewarding form of pay per click patterns because they are displayed on the search result pages and the Internet user can scan them together with the search results he/she is after.

Pay per click advertising is not possible without keywords bidding, and finding the right phrases to define a product or service can be pretty difficult sometimes. Presently, softwares are being used for the development of keyword strategies, they are offered by professional companies who make a business out of Internet consultancy for marketing strategies. With the professional dimension of this kind of business, the pay per click system will require constant tracking and monitoring for the analysis of the keywords performance, ROI, web traffic and so on. From this point of view there is no end to the Internet growth circuit that takes ever more resources and time as it grows on.
