

The brotherhood of motorcycle clubs

There are lots of reasons why men and women join clubs. Some may be looking for wholesome entertainment, while others are hoping for companionship, or to find people who share the same philosophies. Indeed, whatever the motivation may be for registering, clubs are great resources for those wanting to socialize and share common interests.

The most common drive for joining a motorcycle club revolves around a deep-rooted love for motorcycles and a tremendous sense of brotherhood. Bike club members are like family, helping one another with mechanical problems, looking out for each other in traffic and enthusiastically sharing the open road.

Motorcycling is a universal sport and relishing fans can be found all over the world, from Canada to Australia or Belgium, and even in the city of Vukovar, in Croatia. Motorcycle clubs are miniature societies with structure and are filled with members of all walks of life. There is no distinction between a lawyer and a truck driver, because once the riding gear and helmet are put on, everyone is just a biker.

Picking the club that is right for you will depend on your lifestyle and social calendar. Most areas have several clubs to choose from, and some bikers will join even more than one club. They can then juggle the different activities presented by all. Activities may include, short rides, overnights, rallies, and meet-ups in local restaurants. Occasionally a picnic or a party at a member's house may be added to the schedule, allowing bikers to bring more than just their back-seat rider. These events are also great to introduce new members or curious admirers interested in a membership.

Well-established clubs will also participate in charitable activities, such as blood donations and runs for cancer, diabetes, or any other helpful cause, and some may publish a newsletter to inform their members about upcoming events and general biker news.

About the Author

CroSci is a non-government organisation which fosters science, technology and education development through a network of free online resources.

Source: <http://www.car-articles.co.uk>